

I'm concerned the US policy makers are not listening to the mandate of the people; the mandate seems to mostly come from the few, largely wealthy corporate interests. The recent FCC rule changes seem yet another example of putting profits for a few, over the freedom and choice of the many. I want information I can trust; I already lack confidence in the existing system, just yesterday, where one major corporation could own many different media entities. My confidence is now less; furthermore, my confidence in the present day high-off "public servants" is shaken. From my vantage point, many come from corporate America where not the public interest but the bottom line dominates. This is a sad situation. I heard the commissioner say he made this choice with consideration of the people's concerns; where is the evidence of that consideration? The only consideration seemed to have been a cursory acknowledgement; I see no substantive consideration in the decision recently made.
